We highlight the physics potential of the general integration of two-dimensional nanostructures, grown by molecular-beam epitaxy, with devices based on light-emitting diodes (LEDs). We summarize the physics of quantum wires and dots and their use as electron/light-emitting or light/photoluminescence transducers. Then we discuss, through a number of examples, the increasing complexity of integrated structures based on these materials. Various systems, including lateral and vertical quantum devices with indium and zinc oxide (InZnO and ZnO), coupled structures, hybrid LEDs, devices using superlattices, nanowire and quantum dot LEDs, hybrid LEDs with vertical GaAs/AlGaAs quantum wells, organic light-emitting diodes, and more, are discussed.
