Keylogger for Windows (optional) This software was reviewed by Ken Cregan, on Oct 16, 2011A quantitative microbial risk assessment model for the German drinking water supply chain. Water is an essential part of our lives. Our drinking water supply chain has a significant impact on the ecosystem. Strict quality standards are in place to protect human health, and the quality of the water is maintained through various preventative and corrective measures. A major error-prevention measure is that water is disinfected to decrease the risk of waterborne diseases. However, disinfection is not considered a zero risk activity; thus, there is a risk of microbial contamination that may result in illness and death. The specific value of this risk is, however, unknown. This study addresses this question in a quantitative risk assessment framework using Probabilistic Risk Assessment (PRA) and Multi-Criteria Decision Analysis (MCDA). Water suppliers were assessed by the European Union, which has legal maximum contamination limits (MCLLs) for different pathogens. Water samples were taken at different points in the water supply chain. The samples were analyzed according to the national standard for drinking water, and the threshold of detectability was set at 4.0×10^3

CFU per 100 mL of water. The risk analysis included the screening of the drinking water supply chain (source, distribution, and treatment) for pathogens, and a quantitative microbial risk assessment model was built. This model is based on the four pathogens Clostridium difficile, Escherichia coli, Legionella pneumophila, and Salmonella. Our model shows that the greatest risks for drinking water, and thus the highest probability of exceedance of the legal thresholds, occur at the point of disinfection. PRA analysis reveals that, with respect to the threshold of detectability, the contribution of distribution and treatment to risks was 0.0041 and 0.2038, respectively. The greatest contribution of disinfection to 09e8f5149f
