The Weight of Influence Are they bringing down the walls? – Editorial Once upon a time, a clever financial institution devised a novel way of advertising: it took the person who would be most influential on his or her audience and made him or her the subject of a series of print advertisements, screened as part of a television programme.

This clever advertising programme was so successful that even after the television programme finished, the banks continued to run the adverts. It was time well spent. Within days, people were recognising and talking to this influential person in the context of the television programme. They were called 'experience mangers' and they became the subject of articles and books. Suddenly, it was no longer enough to spend billions in making TV programmes about people; people had to be the subject of television programmes. The 'experience manager' is now a headline generator. The tagline of one of the world's most successful companies, Starbucks, is 'take me anywhere'. At which point a thought occurred to one of us: why don't the banks follow the example of one of the world's most successful companies and offer a tangible experience as part of their advertisements? A thought occurred to us as well: why are the big banks not more transparent and open about the influence they are able to have on the people that they market to?
