It would significantly cut military ties between the two nations, which have otherwise remained largely friendly throughout the Cold War. (The last agreement between the U.S. and the Soviet Union was the 1967 Treaty of Moscow.) Under terms of the treaty, the U.S. would transfer up to $2.3 billion a year in military supplies to the Russian military, including spare parts for the F-16 fighter, T-72 tanks and M1 Abrams main battle tanks. Washington also would allow Russia to maintain access to strategic ports in Alaska, home to a key bomber base. In return, Russia would allow American inspectors into a dozen Russian military bases, six of which are strategically located along the Northern Sea Route, to ensure the safety of any nuclear material. The agreement also would give Russian experts onto U.S. naval vessels operating in Russian waters. The deal, however, does not touch upon a string of still-feuding issues, including American plans to deploy anti-ballistic missile defenses in Eastern Europe and Russian plans to deploy a new cruise missile system in Europe that could be used to target missile defense systems. tagParts := strings.SplitN(tagValue, ",", 2) if len(tagParts) >= 2 { switch tagParts[0] { case "decodedFields": decodedFieldsVal = append(decodedFieldsVal, fieldValue
