Speaking at the annual South by Southwest conference in Texas, Obama said that the United States has lost "a very basic manufacturing base" and become "not number one in the world, but in fact we're now number four or five in the world." "I wish we could be number one in the world again," Obama said. "I wish we didn't have to compete against countries that are using newer technologies that we haven't had the economic will to embrace." He called for education reform in order to combat these challenges, singling out America's children and students for criticism. Obama told the crowd at South by Southwest that education reform must be a priority.
