I recently purchased a used oven because I wanted to save $$$. (A gas oven is more expensive than the same model range that is electric. I would hate to find out it needs to be replaced.) The oven was purchased three years ago from a hardware store. Upon removing the old oven, I noticed that the cooking elements were pitted on the inside (partly because the seals are not working properly). I am fairly certain that I cannot repair the oven myself. I am confident that I could not replace the cooking elements or even fix the seals. The oven is very "old". It doesn't have a clear "sale" or "clearance" date on the oven. What is the best course of action now? A: I would suggest that you replace it. Old ovens without a date are rare but if it's sealed maybe you can find someone who will take it off your hands. A: Aside from the obvious problem of possibly old components, the second question is where you can get a used stove. Home Depot probably has a good selection, but one you really want is a "commercial" store. Sears or Lowe's or one of those specialty stores will have a better selection, but are a bit more expensive. Since it's a gas oven, it's also likely that the venting system is antiquated, so that's something else to look for in a used one.
