We have described a technique for performing a sequence of sequential biopsies of the fallopian tubes during laparoscopy and assessed the value of these samples by comparing the results of the sequential tube biopsies with the results of previous traditional biopsies. One hundred sixty women with a previous diagnosis of infertility and unexplained infertility were scheduled to undergo laparoscopy with tube biopsies performed. Six to 10 biopsies were obtained from each tube and were processed for cytologic and histologic examination. There were 9 abnormal tubes, of which 2 were related to tubal factors (1 hydrosalpinx and 1 opaque tube) and 7 to extragenital factors (1 ovarian carcinoma and 1 inadequate therapy for an ovarian cyst, 2 endometriosis, and 2 recurrent pelvic inflammatory disease). These results were comparable to the previous findings of the traditional tube biopsies performed before the laparoscopy. Seven additional abnormal tubes were detected with the sequential biopsy technique. Two of these were normal tubes. In 3 cases, the sequential samples taken from the tube demonstrated adenomatous hyperplasia (one case) and tubal obstruction (two cases), respectively, not identified by the previous biopsies. This study demonstrates that the intratubal biopsy technique can be used to detect tubal abnormalities that were not recognized previously. Thus, this technique is useful in diagnosing and managing the fallopian tubes during laparoscopy.
