To make it easier to keep track of all the features, Adobe has a list of them on their website, here. Q: What are options for high performance websocket servers? I'm looking to implement a long running, high volume, websocket server which I need to be able to scale. It is a hobby project, and I'm looking for suggestions on what technologies I should use. By websocket server, I mean that it would act as a connection endpoint for a client, and would take care of establishing and closing the connection. This will be a client side server. The server should be able to have 1000s or even 100000s of concurrent connections open at a time. They would need to stay alive indefinitely. It should be possible to reload the server without losing connections. The server would need to be able to handle multi-threaded connections. I'm looking at Erlang, but its pretty expensive. Scala is an interesting idea, but the application is more complex than it seems. Is Node a sensible approach? A: The easiest approach is to use the standard server from Node.js and for long-lived connections you can use Keep-Alive. It's usually better for the consumer to manage the timeout for themselves (you can read
