You can use TumbleBit to route your internet traffic through a bunch of your neighbors' computers, sharing the cost and offering some security. It is currently in a private beta, and you need to download and install it from the official website. For information on how to install, where to find it and what to do after installation, read the following article. After installing the program, you will find the TumbleBit daemon (ttb) in the background, but you can shut it down. You can then use it in Windows or Mac to make your internet traffic go through the TumbleBit servers. You can run the Windows version or the Mac version, or you can try both. However, the Windows version is not perfectly stable, while the Mac version is more fully featured. But neither of them offers an easy way to configure them or administer them. There is also a Linux version available, but you have to compile it from source yourself. This can be difficult. But if you are a Linux user, you can try it. Note: If you are using Linux and are not familiar with compiling software from source, you can use the Windows version instead. However, if you are a Windows user, you will miss out on the main features of the Mac version. This is because the Mac version is completely self-contained, and that includes the installation wizard, the preferences, the settings and the configuration of everything, so you have a better management interface, as you don't have to download the application. Using the TumbleBit software There are two ways to use TumbleBit. 1. The TumbleBit client This is the Windows and the Mac versions. You run the TumbleBit client as a
